

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

In researching and writing this thesis I have been exceptionally fortunate to have had advice and feedback from three excellent supervisors. I am indebted to Pam Thurschwell and Greg Dart for their thorough reading, sensible criticism and great patience. I owe particular thanks to Roger Sabin, my unofficial supervisor, without whose astonishing generosity, hard work and encyclopaedic knowledge of comics this thesis could not have been written.

I also owe considerable gratitude to the Arts and Humanities Research Council for their generous financial support, and to University College London Graduate School, whose Research Scholarship for Cross-Disciplinary Training enabled me to broaden my understanding of visual culture through a year at the Slade School of Fine Art.

This thesis would not exist in its current form without the help of many friends. Many thanks to Libby Burgess for her meticulous proof-reading, and to Tim Whiteley for his translation of material on Julie Doucet. I am also grateful to Danny Graydon for introducing me to adult comics in the first place, and for providing me with many valuable research materials. Thanks are due to my partner Tom King, for many things, but especially for his invaluable technical support, and for teaching me to use Adobe InDesign. Finally, I owe a great debt to my parents Dot and Mark Tinker for thirty years of support and encouragement, and for imposing absolutely no censorship on my childhood reading matter.

An early version of chapter 1, and parts of chapter 7, were presented as conference papers at the Popular Culture Association Conference, Atlanta, GA, April 2005, and at the Third International Conference on the Book, Oxford Brookes University, September 2005. I am grateful to UCL Graduate School for providing me with funds to attend these conferences.
